JUNGLE, THE (1906). Published in 1906, Upton *Sinclair's The Jungle remains one of the most influential novels in American political and social history. Sinclair was a socialist writer who had just published a book on chattel slavery and an article on the meatpackers' failed 1904 strike for the socialist periodical Appeal to Reason. Invited by the journal's editor, Fred Warren, to do another exposé, this time of wage slavery, Sinclair in the autumn of 1904 lived for seven weeks in *Chicago's meatpacking district, investigating both the plants and the adjoining workers' residences.

Based on this research, Sinclair wrote a graphic description of conditions encountered by a fictional family of Lithuanian immigrants. Jurgis Rudkus, the protagonist, is optimistic that he will succeed in America because of his physical strength and his work ethic. Instead, the industrial order grinds down not only Jurgis but every member of his family, several of whom die or suffer other terrible fates.

While Sinclair's goal was to expose the evils of industrial *capitalism and demonstrate the need for *socialism, the public's reaction was very different. At a time when middle-class consumers were being taught to trust national name brands as symbols of purity and quality, Sinclair offered a very different message. The Jungle portrayed an industry in which monopolistic corporations sold diseased and damaged meat and invested in *advertising rather than in pure and safe products. In the resulting uproar, Congress passed the *Pure Food and Drug Act and the Meat Inspection Act in 1906. Commented a disappointed Sinclair: "I aimed at the public's heart and by accident I hit it in the stomach." Later critics attacked the pessimism of the book, especially Sinclair's failure to recognize the resourcefulness of immigrant workers.
