"THE MINISTER IN HIS RELATION TO THE COMMUNITY"

No. 9 Revised

The Minister in his relation to the Community.

I. Collier 4/16/31 Revised

The minister is largely regarded as public property and a community asset. He is the one man in the community that almost everyone feels free to call upon when in trouble, in sorrow, or desiring gratuitous service.

Many seek his counsel, take his time and even put him to expense, although not contributing a dollar to his salary. They just seem to naturally feel that it is their full privilege to go to him when in need, in any way.

Years ago when in B.F. Coulter's office -- etc.

The Church stands in the community life as an indispensable public institution and the minister a benefactor. The Church has much to give for the general good and consequently, the leader or minister is looked upon as one who is simply living to help others, his chief mission being to serve. It is therefore evident that the minister must play a big and important part in the life of his community.

The complex social life of today, the passion of our people for pleasure and for business as well, makes it far more difficult for a minister to intelligently meet these demands than it was for the preacher to meet the demands of a generation ago.

While we recognize that the minister's first duty is to his Church, he is nevertheless, a citizen of the community and owes to it certain obligations. He is looked upon as an influential and helpful factor in the life of the community, not only because of his intellectual ability and his leadership of a congregation, but because he is the recognized exponent of the blessed religion, the very foundation of which in its practical application, is to serve.

However strong the pull and the urge is upon you to take up affairs of the community, you must not get so interested in them as to neglect your own Church. With you, it must ever come first. The community does not pay your salary. In fact, seldom makes any contribution to it. You must be cautious about giving too much time to the general public even from a less selfish standpoint than that.

I have known ministers who got so entangled in civic and social organizations that their churches suffered and had reasons to complain. Be on your guard at this point.

When you become identified with any public movement or civic organization you ^{must like} will be put on committees and thus the way is opened, if you are efficient, for other demands on your time. Soon, unless you are resolute, you are devoting too much of your time to outside enterprises.

You must however, be a public spirited citizen, ready to make a reasonable contribution of your time to public enterprises.

In every community today there are service clubs,- Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions, American Legion, etc. You may make fine and helpful contacts here, should you become a member of any one of them. You should have the interest of the Church so at heart that you will not join any of these orders solely for the good social times you may have. You should have other motives. I think the fellowship you would have, the entertainment and the lectures you would hear would be helpful to you, as they broaden, as well as inform one on affairs of the day, and ^{make help to you to} learn the temper and the needs of the people.

Should you become a Rotarian, a Kiwanian or a Lion, act well your part as a minister. Don't get the idea because you are with a bunch of good fellows that you must in the least compromise yourself by trying to be too frivolous or rough. You are a Christian minister and while you can enter heartily into all that is clean and dignified, and have a royal good time, you must not say or do anything that is inconsistent with your high calling. Should you stoop to do this, the very men about you ^{who} had called you a "jolly good fellow" would have less respect for you for thus compromising yourself. They know something of the high standards of the ministry and with all their worldliness, have high regard for those in it who are loyal and consistent.

Never forget in any place or position that you are a minister of the Gospel and an ambassador of Christ. I knew a minister who often seemed to forget his high calling, thinking to carry favor with the business and professional men he met at the Club. He was bright, scholarly and a good story teller and therefore, made interesting company. These men enjoyed his fellowship, but lost respect for him as a minister.

Let me caution you not to give too freely of your time, but establishing right relations with those you meet in this social way, and maintaining your self-respect as a minister, you will find these club connections, opportunities of personal refreshment and channels of usefulness.

There are organizations looking to the uplift and welfare of the community that must have your attention and sympathy and a limited amount of your time. You are in a position to encourage them in many ways. I refer to organizations for public health, local relief and similar organizations.

The school and public library must have recognition. Every city has its Chamber of Commerce for the purpose of advertising and boosting the town and encouraging civic improvements. Give this your support but only a little of your time.

There are labor organizations, art associations, law enforcement and social service organizations and the Anti-Saloon League, all seeking recognition from you. The Y.M.C.A., Y.W.C.A., W.C.T.U., Conventions and Conferences that are continually asking for your support.

Be interested and lend a helping hand, but be cautious about getting too deeply involved in any of them. All of these organizations or movements appeal to anyone who is living to serve, who has a real interest in the welfare of his community and whose help is often sought in their behalf. But you must remember that your time and best thought belong to the Church. By the very nature of things you can only do a given amount of work. You have just so much time allotted to you and if you scatter over the entire realm of human service, you will signally fail in all.

If you are a faddist, taking up a certain movement or cause and harping on it all the time, you are likely to offend some and bring discord into your Church. Be a sane men he met at the Club. He was bright, scholarly and a good story teller and therefore, made interesting company. These men enjoyed his fellowship, but lost respect for him as a minister.

Let me caution you not to give too freely of your time, but establishing right relations with those you meet in this social way, and maintaining your self-respect as a minister. I know a minister of rare spirit & ability who has is obsessed with the internationalist idea. He never talks or prays publically without getting some of his ideas on this very laudable subject, his people, ^{however} and getting weary & Tired of this.

If you are a faddist, taking up a certain movement or cause and harping on it all the time, you are likely to offend some and bring discord into your Church. Be a sane and safe leader. While I caution you about going into outside enterprises or organizations, you must not be a recluse. You are a citizen of the community and must of course, be interested in local public enterprises. I have known some pastors who lived only for their congregations. They were never seen at any public gathering, save in their own Church. Be temperate and consistent in these matters, as well as in all others.

You must exercise extreme caution concerning politics or taking public part in local elections. Your people may be divided on questions at issue and on candidates and while, as a citizen you have a right to your opinions and this will be recognized, you cannot safely from the pulpit, make known your preferences or use your position as minister of the Church to advance them.

When there is a clearly drawn moral issue, you should have the courage to take a decided stand. This will be expected of you. But even here, be sane, temperate and consistent. Fanaticism or even radicalism often does more harm to a cause than can be offset by much preaching.

You must be a patriot, having sincere love for your country, ever seeking the election of good men to office and the passing of beneficent laws and insisting upon their enforcement.

Should your community attempt to clean up a bad political and social situation that has developed in its life, you will of course, join with the forces of righteousness for this task. Do not however, resort to bitter and vicious personal abuse or say anything unbecoming a minister of the Gospel. Exhibit here as always, the spirit of your Master. While you should oppose evil, do it in a manner that will not lower the Church or your own standing in the estimation of the good people of your city. Great harm is often done the religion of Christ at such times by the display of an ugly or vicious temper on the part of the ministers of the community.

If you are invited to the golf course by admiring friends, be careful not to get too deeply interested.

Golf is a fascinating game and gets so strong a hold on some men that all else is neglected. I presume the exercise in the open and the mental recreation is most desirable, but wait until you are ^{some} well along in life before becoming an habitual golfer. ~~A~~ think a preacher when he is young and in good health can get plenty of exercise calling on his flock.

As you go about on errands of mercy or calling upon your parishioners, don't forget or neglect to drop into the hospital. There are those on beds of suffering, those who are lonely and will be greatly helped by a friendly call and a cheerful happy word. Often some of the flowers used in decorating the Church Sunday can be used to brighten up some of the rooms in the hospital and bring joy to the suffering.

You must be ready to serve at all times and under all circumstances. You are the one man in the community that must not live unto himself. You are Christ's representative in your community and you must be true and faithful minister of His. You must have His mind so you will see man, frail, weak and sinful as He would and then have His spirit so that you will be impelled to treat him as He would were He here.

Like Jesus, be friendly and kind. Have a smile and friendly helping hand for all who may cross your path. You will then be loved by many and while you are living for others, you will find others trying to make you happy. You will be honored and loved as the friend of man.

"There are noble titles, noble names,
That he may wear who can,
But the noblest name among them all,
Is simply - "Friend o' Man".

Be cheerful, happy and optimistic. Wherever you go, carry sunshine and not gloom. A minister should ever and always be affable, gracious, benevolent and friendly. Cultivate these attractive qualities in the spirit of humility.
