12-10-2014

“Can You Hear Me? Do You Care?”: The Police as Agents of Social Control against Black Women in the U.S.

Desiree Greenhouse
Chapman University, green232@mail.chapman.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.chapman.edu/cusrd_abstracts

Part of the Inequality and Stratification Commons, Race and Ethnicity Commons, and the Social Control, Law, Crime, and Deviance Commons

Recommended Citation
http://digitalcommons.chapman.edu/cusrd_abstracts/4

This Poster is brought to you for free and open access by the Office of Undergraduate Research and Creative Activity at Chapman University Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Student Research Day Abstracts and Posters by an authorized administrator of Chapman University Digital Commons. For more information, please contact laughtin@chapman.edu.
“Can You Hear Me? Do You Care?”: The Police as Agents of Social Control against Black Women in the U.S.

Desiree Greenhouse
Department of Sociology; Chapman University; Orange, California

Introduction to Research

Intentions of Anti-Black Social Control

• White supremacy came from the desire for wealthy white men to manage and preserve their economic, political, and social power which prompted them to realize that in order to do so, they had to call upon an allegiance between all whites (Martinnit 2003). The motive for power and control was not only the rationalization for and essential need to enforce whiteness through police violence against Black people as a class (Martinnit 2003).

Colorblindness and the Legality of Anti-Black Racism

• The struggle for emancipation and civil rights in the 19th and 20th centuries were all defined on “white preponderance” (Martinnit 2003: 6). The fact that Jim Crow law was replaced with federal civil rights acts, for example, maintained the legal paradigm (Alexander 2010; Martinnit 2003).

• The fact that race is an outdated social construction has continually been shrugged off in an attempt to bury what racialization is really all about as well as its very real and potent consequences that are experienced today (Alexander 2010; Bonilla-Silva 2006; Martinnit 2003). The denial of the existence of ascribed racial delineations and their historical ramifications, e.g. color-blind racism has only made racism more cogent because it is no longer retrospectively a question of ethics, but presently, an issue of legality (Bonilla-Silva 2006; Alexander 2010).

Police as the Contemporary Mechanism of Social Control against Black Americans

• The axiom of colorblindness and simultaneous anti-black racism that had aided legal procedure.

• The process of identifying a criminal based on race, or “profiling”, is prejudice but its acceptance by the dominant group once again obscures racism into a mere necessary police procedure (Alexander 2010; Martinnit 2003).

• Joy James alludes to the fact that “the national icons for welfare cheat, rapist, thief, and murderer as the embodiment of the word ‘crime’ are White and male, with black male offenders having a higher probability of being sentenced to prison” (James 2010).

• The axiom of colorblindness and simultaneous anti-black racism that had aided legal procedure. Black women in a complex way that enforces both gender and race as oppressive mechanisms.

• The politics of the bodies of Black women have revolved around the white notions of the “Hottentot”, the “Jewel”, “Aunt Jemima”, and a physical and emotional association of Black femininity to the traits of wild animals (Guy-Shetlall 2002; Collins 2000; Morgan 2004).

• Because Black women’s lives are in the service of the dehumanizing and objectification of Black female bodies has been the implicit moral justification for entrapping sexual violence against them.

History of Physical Violence as a Form of Social Control against Black Women: Slavery, the Jim Crow era, and Police Brutality

• Social control has marked the history of Black Americans, and has been reiterated in changing forms. The physical violence that Black men and women experience is a gendered form of social control.

• Angela Davis states that the “pattern of institutionalized sexual abuse” against Black women was “so powerful that it managed to survive the abolition of slavery” (1991: 175).

• Within the slave class, Black women were subject to institutionalized rape as a form of socially controlling both their economic status and the degradation of their physical bodies (Davis 1991; Collins 2000). The “hypersexuality” of Black women was used as justification for rape (McGruder 2010; McGuffey 2010; Guy-Shetlall 2002; Collins 2000). For Black women, lynching was also a tool of social control with themes of hypersexuality and metabolism to uphold the justification for the atrocities against them. The cases of Mary Turner and the Memphis Riot of 1865 are paramount examples of this social control (Armstrong 2008; Lerner 1972; Delongoria 2006).

• While Black women are subject to the same kinds of police brutality that Black men are, the physical violence of Black women takes form via the contextual stereotypes of Black female bodies as being hypersexual, inherently criminal, and in need of regulation (Crenshaw 2013; Hicks 2010). Cheryl Hicks discussed how the police brutality of Black women during the early 20th century was rationalized by law enforcement as being justifiable fair on the “grounds that they must be prostitutes” (Davis 1985).

• In the United States, 62,034 forcible rapes were reported in 2013 to the police in an estimated population of 299,265,511 (USDOJ 2013). The percent of rape and sexual assault victimization reported to the police in 2012 was only 28% (Truman et al. 2013).

• If a woman lived in an urban location especially if she was between the ages of 12 and 17, and who earned a household income of less than $25,000 were more likely to be victims of rape and sexual assault (Planty et al. 2013).

• In 2012, Black/African-American victims had a rate of 34.2 of violent victimization which includes rape; the third highest rate behind American Indian/ Alaskan Native and those categorized under two or more races (Truman et al. 2013). Between 2005 and 2010, it was reported that Black women had the highest rate of being victims of rape and sexual assault right behind American Indian/ Alaskan Natives and those who were categorized as two or more races (Planty et al. 2013).

• Between 2005 and 2010, over 3.4 million violent crimes including rape and sexual violence were unreported to police (Berkery et al. 2013). The reason for not reporting the crime was for fear of reprisal and also the belief that police would do nothing (Planya et al. 2013).

• 2010 Annual Report by the CATO Institute showed that sexual misconduct constituted the second highest form of police misconduct in the last four years (2010-2014).

Results

• In the United States, 62,034 forcible rapes were reported in 2013 to the police in an estimated population of 299,265,511 (USDOJ 2013). The percent of rape and sexual assault victimization reported to the police in 2012 was only 28% (Truman et al. 2013).

• If a woman lived in an urban location especially if she was between the ages of 12 and 17, and who earned a household income of less than $25,000 were more likely to be victims of rape and sexual assault (Planty et al. 2013).

• In 2012, Black/African-American victims had a rate of 34.2 of violent victimization which includes rape; the third highest rate behind American Indian/ Alaskan Native and those categorized under two or more races (Truman et al. 2013). Between 2005 and 2010, it was reported that Black women had the highest rate of being victims of rape and sexual assault right behind American Indian/ Alaskan Natives and those who were categorized as two or more races (Planty et al. 2013).

Conclusion

Gender and Race

• As both the statistical and content analysis demonstrated, women in particular are more often the victims of sexual violence than their male counterparts.

• In general, Black women are victims of sexual violence at a greater disproportionalty than women of other races (albeit Alaskan or Native Indian women) which reflects the mechanisms of misogynoir and the stereotypes of Black womanhood and their social disenfranchisement, among others (Truman et al. 2013; Planty et al. 2013; Wriggins 1983; Fausto-Sterling 2002; Collins 2000; Morgan 2004).

Police as Perpetrators of Sexual Violence against Black Women

• In relation to police violence, as past scholars like Angela Davis (1985), Gerda Lerner (1972), and many others have articulated through cases in the past, law enforcement continues to exercise their power against Black women through sexual violence. The gendered dimension of the claim has been upheld by both the CATO Institute (2010), and the study done by Samuel Walker and Dawn Irlbeck (2002) which have effectively demonstrated that police sexual misconduct has been recorded and shows specifically targets women.

• When these realities are synthesized upon the likelihood of the victim, the racial and gendered realities of such a victimization caused by police through sexual violence is significantly skewed towards Black women. As Figure 2 shows, eight out of nine victims whose racial identity was disclosed were Black women. Fear of reporting crimes committed against them by police, thus, is a repeated byproduct akin to past mechanisms of social control which worked to silence Black female accusers. The perceived legitimacy of a Black woman’s accusation of rape against a police officer would have to go against the white conceptions of her hypersexuality (that is, they wanted to engage in sexual activity with her) but also her objectification. Or the perpetrator offered the

Synthesized Realities

• Upon analysis, the sexual violence against women, in general, as well as Black women, in particular, which was typically perpetrated through fear and coercion, and was arguably seen as excusable in some way through the media framing and resilient departmental, police brutality, that police have in society is real to the degree that their roles as “protectors” are no longer applicable. If the “peculiar” institution of continued brutality against Black women can be seen as evident through this content analysis, it is clear that social control is not new but transformed and substituted via police sexual violence.

Purpose of Study

This study sought to provide greater awareness of the violent and particular oppression of Black women through the sanctioned force of social control in this country: law enforcement.

Methods

• Statistical data about the prevalence of rape and the sociodemographic attributes of victims, as well as data on police sexual misconduct.

Content analysis was conducted on a total of twenty-one news articles which reported on fifty rape or sexual assault cases published in the last four years (2010-2014).

Synthesized Realities

• Upon analysis, the sexual violence against women, in general, as well as Black women, in particular, which was typically perpetrated through fear and coercion, and was arguably seen as excusable in some way through the media framing and resilient departmental, police brutality, that police have in society is real to the degree that their roles as “protectors” are no longer applicable. If the “peculiar” institution of continued brutality against Black women can be seen as evident through this content analysis, it is clear that social control is not new but transformed and substituted via police sexual violence.

Purpose of Study

This study sought to provide greater awareness of the violent and particular oppression of Black women through the sanctioned force of social control in this country: law enforcement.