Hello Darling:

I'm so very very tired tonight that I probably won't write a very interesting letter but I know you will forgive me, please. Had about four hours sleep last night and put in a long hard day of work today. The brightest spot of the day was receiving a letter from you. Thank you Dear for remembering me today.

The fellows thought I was a little batty when, after reading your letter, I couldn't help laughing out loud. It's the letter about the "curse". It was so extremely funny yet when I thought of it I could realize what a terrible predicament you must have been in. Next time when you expect the "curse" catching up with you you'll go to work prepared. The young lady in question is going to break her arm one of these days, and soon too, by bragging what a "good woman" she is. We'll see what we shall see.

at times this same young lady tends to belittle herself such as saying she isn't a good cook. Sorry I must disagree as I've had a sample of her cooking about three weeks ago - excellent.

Thank you for your sweet compliments pertaining to my work here but as the situation stands I'm just one small cog in a vast network. Are you really proud of me Dear. Don't worry about me around the planes. They are now to me like second nature. To you they are probably still strange and you're probably still a landlubber and not yet airborne. That is probably why you fear them.

Soon, in about two hours, it will be Tuesday which means one day sooner when I can again hold you in my arms. Sleepily I kiss you "Good-night" in memory and with oceans of love I am

Lonesome
