Images of Sexually Deviant Women in French Film

Lara Fox
Chapman University, fox134@mail.chapman.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.chapman.edu/cusrd_abstracts

Part of the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender Studies Commons, Other Feminist, Gender, and Sexuality Studies Commons, Other French and Francophone Language and Literature Commons, Other Rhetoric and Composition Commons, Visual Studies Commons, and the Women's Studies Commons

Recommended Citation
http://digitalcommons.chapman.edu/cusrd_abstracts/205

This Poster is brought to you for free and open access by the Office of Undergraduate Research and Creative Activity at Chapman University Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Student Research Day Abstracts and Posters by an authorized administrator of Chapman University Digital Commons. For more information, please contact laughtin@chapman.edu.
Abstract

This research explores representations of sexually deviant women in French film beginning with the New Wave film movement of the 1960s and continuing to present day. This work examines the extent to which the gender of a film’s director affects the presentation of female nudity, infidelity, homosexuality, BDSM, and pornography onscreen. Through the lens of feminist and anti-feminist works of famous French directors such as Jean-Luc Godard, Catherine Breillat, and Emmanuelle Bercot, this capstone work identifies filmic triumphs and failures of French feminism. Furthermore, by applying feminist film theory, it analyzes which cinematographic, rhetorical, and narrative techniques best serve to liberate women onscreen and tell the stories of their sexuality accurately and honestly in the hopes of creating a reference point for future feminist filmmakers. The probable conclusion of this research is that in most every instance, with few notable exceptions, only a female director can truly express the sexual lives of designated female at birth individuals (DFAB). It is important to note that this work excludes an examination of transsexuality in French film, due to a lack of existing scholarly works on the subject, and focuses exclusively on representations of the DFAB sexual experience.

Conclusions

After researching and watching French films about or containing sexually deviant women from the 1950s to present day, the predictions of film theorist Laura Mulvey and feminist author Hélène Cixous prove to be well-informed and increasingly quantifiable. Cixous has long asserted that only women are qualified to represent the truth of womankind; especially their sexual truths. She states in her book The Laugh of the Medusa “Woman must write herself: must write about women and bring women into writing, from which they have been driven away as violently as from their bodies…Woman must put herself into the text—as into the world and into history—by her own movement” (37).

Mulvey uses these ideas to translate the call to action of Cixous into the more presently relevant medium of film. As Mulvey describes in her book Visual and Other Pleasures, “these demands [for increased feminist representation] are directed primarily at commercial and popular cinema” and they necessitate “a confrontation with the sexist nature of the industry itself and its discrimination against women” (120).

After researching many jarring examples of the longstanding cinematic objectification of women in spite of the predictions of film theorist such as Jean-Luc Godard, Catherine Breillat, and Emmanuelle Bercot, for instance, manage to conquer the subjective feminine experience of sex and sexuality. The films of Breillat and Bercot, among others, manage to conquer the longstanding cinematic objectification of women in spite of the industry itself being overwhelmingly phallocentric. Which techniques were employed by them to achieve this and are they easily identifiable as components of a template for future filmmakers of any gender?

Conclusion

The preliminary conclusion prompted further research into those films found to be most effective in their honest representation of the subjective feminine experience of sex and sexuality. The films of Breillat and Bercot, for instance, manage to conquer the longstanding cinematic objectification of women in spite of the industry itself being overwhelmingly phallocentric. Which techniques were employed by them to achieve this and are they easily identifiable as components of a template for future filmmakers of any gender?

Abdellatif Kechiche’s masterpiece La Vie d’Adèle stands in direct contrast to the theories of Mulvey and Cixous. Though criticized, like the works of Breillat, as pornography, the film aligns itself with the principles of visual subjectivity of the female and—in this case queer—representation of sexuality. This new information led to the final conclusion that though traditionally, male directed images of deviant female sexuality are influenced by the male gaze and are, therefore, inherently sexist; there are easily replicable film techniques that can and should be used by male directors to accurately capture and communicate the female experience.

“Censor the body and you censor breath and speech at the same time. Write yourself. Your body must be heard.”

-Hélene Cixous, The Laugh of the Medusa

References

Images

- Censor the body and you censor breath and speech at the same time. Write yourself. Your body must be heard.”-Helene Cixous, The Laugh of the Medusa

Emmanuelle Bercot

La Vie d’Adèle stands in direct contrast to the theories of Mulvey and Cixous. Though criticized, like the works of Breillat, as pornography, the film aligns itself with the principles of visual subjectivity of the female and—in this case queer—representation of sexuality. This new information led to the final conclusion that though traditionally, male directed images of deviant female sexuality are influenced by the male gaze and are, therefore, inherently sexist; there are easily replicable film techniques that can and should be used by male directors to accurately capture and communicate the female experience.

“Censor the body and you censor breath and speech at the same time. Write yourself. Your body must be heard.”

-Hélene Cixous, The Laugh of the Medusa

References

Images

- Censor the body and you censor breath and speech at the same time. Write yourself. Your body must be heard.”-Helene Cixous, The Laugh of the Medusa

Emmanuelle Bercot