Dearest Darling,

As usual there's not much to write about camp and my daily routine, but I always like to write a little to my baby. You write such nice letters, sweetie that I feel ashamed to send my short ones, but I think you'd rather hear a little from me everyday than to get a longer letter less often. Am I right, honey?

I've been talking to Bernard Bass, the chap who works in the orderly room, and he's going to find out what he can for me about furloughs. The way he talks it's a pretty sure thing so well keep our fingers crossed. Gee, it will be swell to come home to you, darling. We'll be together every minute of the time.

It will be three months tomorrow since I came into the army. Sometimes it seems short, and other times it seems like a long time, but every day I'm in is just one day closer to coming home, and the way things are going now it doesn't look too far off.

I wasn't kidding when I said this was going to be a short one, sweetie. Just shows you how eventful an army life is. Not monotonous, but always pretty much the same.

I love you, darling. That's always pretty much the same, but a little deeper every day, and never monotonous. You are the light of my life, darling. I'm such a lucky guy having you, my sweet little wife, forever and ever,

Your own,
Jack
