Program Notes

Mikhail Glinka (1804-1857) • Overture to A Life for a Tsar

Mikhail Glinka was born June 1, 1804 in Novospasskoye outside of St. Petersburg. It is unknown when his musical training started, though most of his training occurred outside of St. Petersburg. Glinka traveled to Germany, Italy, and France, where he studied and adapted many different Western musical styles.

The St. Petersburg composer Caterino Cavos had already set the patriotic subject of Ivan Susanin to music in 1815, three years after Napoleon's failed invasion of Russia. The 20th anniversary celebration of the victory over Napoleon gave rise to nationalistic and patriotic feelings in Russia, making the Susanin theme an inspiring subject for Glinka. Many Russian folk tunes share certain characteristic turns of phrase or underlying shapes, and Glinka's early acquaintance with folk music enabled him to incorporate certain features into the melodies for A Life for the Tsar.

A Life for the Tsar (Ivan Susanin), written in 1834 through 1836, was Glinka's first opera. This opera was much influenced by Western European musical style. A Life for the Tsar has a nationalistic character because of its subject matter. On December 9, 1836, the premiere was given to a satisfied audience and received great reviews in the press. Overnight Glinka was recognized as Russia's leading composer.

In Act I, Ivan Susanin is preparing for his daughter's marriage to Sobinin, who has just returned from battle. Sobinin reported incorrectly that the Russian army had driven the Polish soldiers from Russia. When Susanin heard that the Russian successor to the Tsar's throne had been chosen, he approved of his daughter's marriage to Sobinin.

In Act II, the Poles celebrate their victories over the Russians. A messenger arrives to report the news regarding the Tsar's succession and relates that the Russians, led by the new Tsar, are fighting back. Meanwhile, the new Tsar is hiding in a forest from the Poles, who tried to capture him.

In Act III, during the marriage of Antonida and Sobinin, the Polish soldiers interrupt the celebration. They demand to be led to the Tsar's hiding place. Susanin leads the Polish troops in the wrong direction while Vanya, Susanin's son, goes to warn the Tsar and his soldiers and Sobinin tries to rescue Susanin.

In Act IV, in the forest, Sobinin and his companions are unable to locate Susanin, but Sobinin is determined to rescue him. Vanya warns the Tsar and his soldiers of the Polish raid. The Polish had suspected that Susanin led them in the wrong direction, and they beat Susanin to death.

Finally in the Epilogue, the Russian people celebrate their victory over the Polish. Antonida, Sobinin, Vanya, and all the people of Russia mourn Susanin who sacrificed himself in order to save the Tsar. A hymn to the new Tsar concludes the opera.

In Tsarist Russia, the opera A Life for the Tsar was popular due to the theme of self sacrifice for the sake of the monarch. After the revolution, the name was changed to Ivan Susanin in order to emphasize the role of the peasant who sacrificed himself for the sake of the country. In recent years, the work is known by both titles.

Antonín Dvořák (1841-1904) • Czech Suite

The later 19th century brought an increasing consciousness of national identity to classical music. Dvořák, born in a Bohemian village, followed Smetana as the leading exponent of Czech musical nationalism, firmly within the classical traditions of Central Europe. His early musical training was followed by employment for some years as a violinist, for a time under Smetana, and then, with the positive encouragement of Brahms, by a life primarily devoted to composition. Dvořák won recognition abroad and rather more grudging acceptance in Vienna. Between 1892 and 1895 he spent some time in the United States as director of the new National Conservatory, a period that brought compositions combining American and Bohemian influence. At home again he was much honored, resisting invitations from Brahms to move to Vienna in favor of a simple life in his own country. He died in 1904, shortly after the first performances of his last opera, Armida.

Most of the music that found its way into the Czech Suite was originally intended for a third serenade. Dvořák began the sketches while still working on a string quartet. When finished, he changed his mind about writing another serenade and instead began to fashion the work later titled Czech Suite, Op. 39, German publishers call it Bohemian Suite. The rather low opus number was a case of Dvořák attempting to deceive his publishers. His agreement to compose new works was evaded by simply claiming that this work was old rather than new. Of the five movements, only the Romance is free of dance elements. The first strongly suggests the music of the national bagpipe with the hint of a polka thrown in for good measure. The actual Polka is a cheerfully elegant version of the dance. The Sousedský (Minuet) doesn't contain much of either dance; instead it more closely approximates a mazurka with the heavy beat falling on the second beat of each bar. The work closes with a brilliant Fendant, a dance filled with powerful accents. Dvořák even throws in a folk-song and brings back a wistful theme from the Romance. The work was first performed in Prague on May 16, 1879.

Igor Stravinsky (1882-1971) • Pulcinella Suite

Igor Stravinsky (1882-1971), one of the great composers of the twentieth century, is known for his varied style, distinct use of rhythm and fresh sonorities. Among his most popular works are the three early ballets, The Firebird (1910), Petrushka (1911) and The Rite of Spring (1913). As seemingly revolutionary as the ballets might be, they were indeed—especially The Firebird—logical given his studies with the Russian composer and orchestrator Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov.

The early ballets were written for the impresario Sergei Diaghilev's Ballet Russes. The success of Stravinsky's contribution to the Ballet Russes led to a great artistic association that would last for many years.

Within a decade of the ballets, Stravinsky began to turn away from the romantic tradition to which he had been exposed and in which he had been working. He sought out new ideas, eventually leading to what would be one of his most stable and long-lasting styles of composition, Neoclassicism.

Among Stravinsky's first Neoclassical works was the ballet Pulcinella, also commissioned by Diaghilev as part of the Ballet Russes. Stravinsky was approached by an excited Diaghilev to write the ballet based on some Italian manuscripts he had received. The manuscripts were considered authentic sketches of Giovanni Baptiste Pergolesi, an eighteenth century Italian composer who died at the age of 26 just as he was gaining international recognition. The Pergolesi manuscripts Diagilev and Stravinsky used as the foundation of their Pulcinella collaboration became one of the biggest scandals in music and a topic still being researched and discussed.

It is not uncommon, especially in previous centuries, for composers and publishers to place another, more successful composer's name on a work in order to sell it and ensure performances. Given the success of Pergolesi, much music was sold with his name as composer; however, a great number of these compositions were not his, and some were actually written years after his death. In the manuscripts Diagilev had attained and that Stravinsky used for Pulcinella, the music turned out to be that of Pergolesi, Wassnaer, Domenico Gallo and Carlo Monza.

Pulcinella was first produced in Paris in 1920 and the great artist was Picasso was among the contributors, designing the decor for the production. The original ballet is about twice as long as the suite and includes singers. As is often done, a suite was extracted to get more performances of the work. Along with some of the excess musical material, the voices were omitted in the suite, sometimes replaced by instruments. The literary source of the ballet comes from a manuscript dated 1700. The manuscript contains several comedies based on the life of a fictional character named Pulcinella; the ballet Pulcinella tells one of these comedies.

The suite begins with the Sinfonia (Overture) based on a theme of Gallo's. The melody is colored with a variety of leaps and syncopation. The interval of an octave is also a part of the Serenata's (Pergolesi's) theme to which Stravinsky adds special effects in orchestration such as harmonics and varied tone colors. The Scherzino, attacca from the Serenata, has three sections and uses music by both Gallo and Pergolesi. Though the solo strings are featured throughout the Suite, they have an expanded role in the Scherzino. The Tarantella (based on a Wassnaer theme), a fast dance moving between 6/8 and 3/4, leads directly and abruptly into the Toccata. The winds are featured in the Gavotta (Monza) movement which is accompanied by two variations. The variations are straightforward compositionally, but Stravinsky adds his own touch with several examples of sharp dissonances and a single occurrence of odd phrasing in the second variation. Vivo (Pergolesi) is an absurdfly movement that provides a large contrast to the rest of the suite. Featured in the movement are the solo string bass and trombone. The Minuetto (Pergolesi) is very lyrical, but as it continues a percussive accompaniment begins to change the mood; after calming a bit, the melody is imitated and juxtaposed in Stravinskian fashion, causing great tension and leading directly into the Finale (Gallo). The Finale is a rhythmic dance based on a simple two-bar phrase and a contrasting second theme. The two-bar phrase is repeated several times (with a second motive against it) abruptly ending the suite.
