Support for Arts

In a truly enlightened society, Paul Ciotti's ignorant attack (Letters, April 30) on government support for the arts would neither need nor deserve a rebuttal.

Ciotti has it all backwards. The government support for the arts does not exclusively benefit the artists. It benefits millions of young people who, without exposure to the arts, would grow up to be spiritual morons. It benefits millions of senior citizens who cannot pay the full price for concerts and plays.

While Picasso and Dickens may have made it on their own, Mozart, Schubert, Soutine, Modigliani, and hundreds of other geniuses died in their 30s with physical wants as a contributing factor in their early deaths. Had they followed Ciotti's advice, civilization would be impoverished, and we would have a surplus of 10-speed bicycle repairmen.
