Dear Sir:

Please allow me to describe my own experience in support of the many pleas that have already appeared in the press urging full resumption of American tourism in Great Britain. From the moment I boarded my British Airways plane, I found myself immersed by that special, civilized ambiance that we traditionally associate with England. The atmosphere of relaxation, ease and gentle humor instantly swept away one's earlier fears.

It was a welcome relief to mingle with the crowds in London, relax in its glorious parks and gardens, and just "get away from it all". Yes, the dollar is weaker than it was a year ago, but the famous British bed-and-breakfast is as big a bargain as ever. I urge my friends to visit England as a healthy antidote to the insanity that has gripped most of the rest of the world.

Yours sincerely,

Henri Temianka
