

Immigration Situations

By Jasmine Nava & Dayana St. Clair

Our topic is about immigration. It's important to us because we want to know why the people come here to the U.S. I think that other people shouldn't take away others' family members. We want the readers to know how immigrants feel when they are separated from their families, and inspire them.

Family Separation

Family separation may have hit thousands more migrants' children than reported. In May 2018, the government caused more than 2,300 children to be separated from their parents. Children need their parents to survive. Under President Donald Trump's administration, thousands of more children may have been separated from their parents at the border than previously before. The government has to stop separating parents and children. Trump ended the "zero tolerance" policy with an executive order on June 20, 2018. People need to understand how families feel when their children are separated from them.

Controlling families at the southwest border increased significantly after the pseudo-interventions. There is a policy of separating children from their parents at the United States southwest border. According to ABC News, President Donald Trump separates families with the potential of not knowing when they would see their family members again. The people working at the shelter near the border had been instructed not to pick up or touch the children to comfort them. Imagine not being able to pick up a child who is not yet out of diapers.

Children Mental health

Many immigrant children have mental health issues. The children don't want to talk anymore because they were prevented from communicating for weeks or longer. Children released back to their parent's are exhibiting signs of anxiety. Many children who could be benefited from treatment do not get the help they need. The immigrant people have signs of anxiety disorders as well.

We need to know how they feel about their mental health and what expressions they portray now. All of Mexico can influence the long term outcome for separated children. When the children and parents are reunited, they don't talk because of the traumatic situation they went through previously. Children's mental health is a paradox. Links between poverty and poor mental health are found more in immigrant children than non-immigrant children. Girls have fewer emotional problems than immigrant boys, according to US News. Although less common, development disorders like depression and lack of attention occur.

Children who grow up through traumatic family separation develop mental health problems which can result in lower educational achievement, greater involvement with the criminal justice system, and fewer stable placements in the child welfare system than their peers. Understanding more about the protective factors against mental illness is being explored. People may find that a hyperactive, anxious, or psychotic child is having a reaction to a medication.

The government plans have not worked since separating parents and children, but this did not deter immigrants from coming to the U.S. People have to think about parents and how children feel and reach out to help these parents and children. When young children get separated they do not know what is happening We should help parents and children to reunite. We need to know the existing problems immigrant families have and work to help them. Immigrant people come to the U.S because they want a better life and to get a good job and they want to be with their family, and no one should stop them from this.

Families coming to the U.S

“Separating parents from their children could be a tough deterrent.”

This year, within the last four months, apprehension was up to 500 percent over May 2017. Notice that even as awareness of the new policy increased, the number of family-unit apprehensions did not substantially change. People become refugees when they're desperate to escape violence. Wendy Young from the Washington Post said that “The violence is throughout Honduras, El Salvador and Guatemala. The government is too weak or too corrupt to control it. So people make the only choice they feel they have available and they run.”
